

Abstract

The thesis “The coming crisis of czech sociology?” is talking about the current situation of czech sociology. In the last fifteen years there have been evident effects, which have a negative influence on position of sociology in czech society. The first effect is the academic crisis (mass growth of university education). The second effect is the crisis of humanities (underrating of humanities). Also, there is an existence of specific developmental problem. These effects have desintegrative consequences on czech sociology, which contends with unprecedented growth of university students. Afterwards, these students are not able to find adequate job position in this field of study. This thesis talks about all these phenomena. In the first part, this thesis describes the environment of current state of czech sociology and puts emphasis on the above mentioned topics- problem situation of university education, uncertain position of humanities and complicated development of sociology as a science. The second part describes current situation of czech sociology. There is analysed, the massification of university education and its impact on sociological fields taught in six public academic departments. Also, there is a part talking about the growing number of sociologists- what will happen with them after their graduation- their employment in the field, in labour market and describes the relation between sociologists and the public. The result of this thesis is the analysis of the position of current czech sociology (mainly academic and public).
